Teaching for Integration in the Science of Reading Era

Literacy educators often think about integration of children into communities of readers and writers, about the integration of cognitive, linguistics and affective systems, the myelination of neural pathways, the consolidation of understandings, the inclusion of difference, and the importance of unity. This is why it can be particularly difficult for us when it seems, sometimes, that things fall apart. This presentation is about the historical context of the present dis-integration of politics and pedagogy, and ways to find a sense of integrity in a charged and changing landscape for literacy educators.
